

3 Green Prefabs for less than $120,000

THESE SMALL, SUSTAINABLE SPACES MAKE FOR FINE, AFFORDABLE LIVING.

As more people become interested in sustainable living, more companies are offering small, low-cost green prefabricated homes—often ready to go up in days.

The i-house includes ample natural light and outdoor living spaces.

I-HOUSE

Clayton Homes, one of America's largest prefabricated home manufacturers, has developed the i-house "to create an environmentally friendly house that promotes healthy living at a price people can afford," says Brandon O'Connor, Clayton's i-house specialist. The 723-square-foot basic unit costs around $75,000 and can be expanded and customized. The highly efficient i-house's 4-kilowatt solar-electric system powers it for about a dollar a day.

Each Cottage in a Day home is constructed by a single craftsman.

COTTAGE IN A DAY

Last August, Cottage in a Day delivered the first of its factory-built homes. Constructed with structural insulated panels (SIPs)—efficient foam sandwiched between two pieces of oriented strand board—the homes exceed the National Association of Home Builders' green standards. Local suppliers provide materials, and excess materials are rebuilt into furniture, mailboxes and birdhouses. Cottage in a Day's 1428 SB model offers 375 square feet and a 288-square-foot deck for $117,000.

BLU HOMES

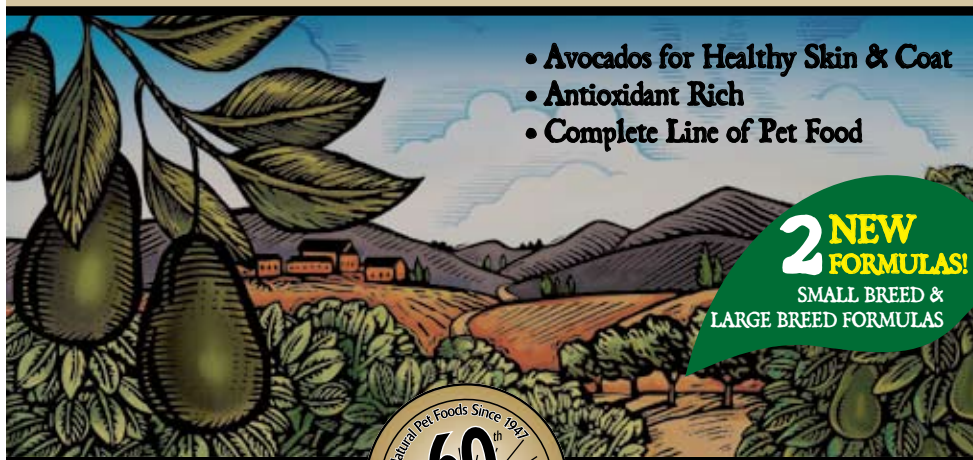

Blu Homes save 30 to 50 percent in energy and release half the carbon emissions of a typical home. The 600-square-foot, one-bedroom/one-bath Origin prefab costs around $90,000. The company uses a combination of modular and flat-pack technology to reduce shipping costs. "Our goal as a company has been to provide sustainable homes for ordinary Americans," says Maura McCarthy, cofounder and vice president of business development.
